go predominantly to men, while the underclass of teachers remain disproportionately female? And, perhaps more importantly, are we willing to tolerate this injustice because of the gendered nature of the division of labour?

Solving the Problem

Godfrey called for administrators and tenured professors—preoccupied with research, writing and preservation of essential programmes—to stop regarding these legitimate and well qualified colleagues as “an exploitable and regrettable reality which we would just as soon forget about”. In order to fully integrate these scholars into the university community, Godfrey suggested that universities pay salaries appropriate to the teaching and scholarly duties performed, i.e. one-third of the Assistant Professor, Associate Professor, or Full Professor’s salary for one course, depending on qualifications. As well, part-time faculty should be made eligible for fringe benefits, have access to internal and external research funds available to full-time faculty, and be represented in departmental and university-wide decision making. Part-time faculty should also be made eligible for tenure and promotion, and given seniority when tenure-stream positions do become available, which they are projected to do in the near future. As Godfrey concluded, “it is time for all of us to recognize that we have all shared in the creation of a group of faculty colleagues who are making a fundamental contribution to their university communities and who deserve a long overdue recognition, accommodation, and acceptance within the ranks of full-time faculty.”

Hannant, speaking from the viewpoint of limited term faculty, suggested that sessionals should be incorporated into either TA or faculty unions, preferably the latter, giving them a much needed organizational voice. He also suggested that the C.A.U.T. establish a committee to deal with problems unique to sessionals; that it have a sessional representative on its council; and that it urge its member faculty associations to include sessionals and bargain for them. Only by improving salaries and benefits, and/or placing limits on the percentage of faculty which can be part-time (say, 20 percent as an upper limit) will the incentive to hire non-tenured staff disappear.
