ACADEMIC HISTORY AND THE NEW CANADIAN WAR MUSEUM

Most recent graduates with doctorates in Canadian history hope that they will go on to careers in academe. I obtained my Ph.D. from McGill University in the spring of 1997 and, joining the guild of professionally-trained academic historians, I too dreamed of finding work in the ivory tower. But since supply in this field seems to have exceeded demand in the past decade, it is useful to remember that there are options, and life, beyond a university teaching career.

Following a year of the sessional grind during which I taught a variety of university-level history courses simultaneously in Montreal, Quebec City, and Lennoxville, Quebec, in the spring of 1998 a job opportunity arose from a wholly unexpected quarter. The Canadian War Museum (CWM) was seeking a fluently-bilingual specialist in Canadian military history holding a doctorate in the field. I applied. The impressive hiring team made up of historians J.L. Granatstein, Roger Sarty, and Dean Oliver, made me eager to work there. All of us, under Jack Granatstein's leadership as Director and Chief Executive Officer of the museum, would be starting together to help reshape the CWM's sagging public image and invigorate its in-house historical expertise.

I got the job. By July 1998, I was working as a public historian whose mandate, in addition to strictly museum work, included continuing an active academic life of publishing (all four of us since then have published books), teaching, public speaking, and assuming a strong profile with the public and media. It has been a demanding but exciting period – one which has helped put the museum on the map of important Canadian historical and cultural institutions.

The public history museum environment provided us with the chance to instill knowledge and understanding of Canada's complex and fascinating military past to hundreds of thousands of actual and virtual visitors every year. Most academics reach far fewer students and readers in their entire careers. CWM is a wonderful vehicle from which to promote Canadian military history – from pre-contact to Kosovo – in all its facets, among them, combat-related events and experiences, the political and international implications of military affairs, social change, differing cultural approaches to military policy, national economic renewal, personal tragedy and bereavement, and the often elusive search for peace. One challenge confronting an academically-trained public historian is the need to balance accessible and dynamic history meant to interest and entice visitors with the professional responsibility to deliver products of unyielding quality in a thought-provoking and stimulating manner.

But the topic sells itself: it is emotional, dramatic, and fundamental to fully appreciating Canada's history. Almost daily in the national press are articles relating to Canadian military history or veterans' issues. The May 2000 unveiling of the Tomb of the Unknown Soldier in Ottawa showed clearly that millions of Canadians cared about their history and its often tragic consequences. Perhaps realizing that the generation which fought the First World War is all but gone and that the average age of a Canadian Second World War veteran is nearly 80, appreciative Canadians are marking Remembrance Day across Canada in seemingly greater numbers than in decades past. Canadians are fascinated by their military history. We see it every day at the museum, sometimes in moving ways. Possibly because they know so little about the topic, students I have taught at the university level are extremely interested in understanding more about the horrors which confronted earlier generations of Canadians. Many wish other courses in Canadian history would integrate some military history. Courses on these and general military history are invariably popular across the country and, in general, the academic community appears to be lagging behind public interest on this topic.

Canadians strongly supported the news that the Canadian War Museum is finally getting a new facility. On March 16, 2000, the Honourable Sheila Copps, Minister of Canadian Heritage, announced that the federal government would commit $58.2 million spread over five years towards the building of a new Canadian War Museum to replace the cramped and hopelessly inadequate storage and research facilities currently in use. Slated to open its doors in 2004, the new custom-built facility is to be specially designed to house in environmentally-safe conditions Canada's immense collection of military artifacts, unique archival material, and war art. It will be erected on the site of the former Canadian Forces Base in Rockcliffe using a large parcel of land made available by the Department of National Defence. The new location is ideal: riverside surroundings, easily accessible, plenty of parking space, and less than one kilometre from the National Aviation Museum. It is anticipated that the museum will also house a centre of research excellence for the study of all aspects of Canadian military history. Moreover, the museum will stand as a memorial to honour the contributions of Canadians who served in war and peace throughout the nation's history.

The final cost of the new state-of-the-art facility is estimated to be $80 million. The Canadian Museum of Civilization Corporation, the war museum's parent organization, has anted up $7 million, while the Passing the Torch Campaign, CWM's fund-raising organization, is attempting to raise the remaining $15 million. Thus far, it has gathered more than $6 million and the team is hopeful that ordinary Canadians and especially corporate donors will continue to give generously. Jack Granatstein's major goal during his two-year term as head of the museum was to obtain government funding for a new building. He left in June 2000 with his mission accomplished. His successor, Joe Geurts, Chief Operating Officer and Senior Vice-President of the Canadian Museum of Civilization, will oversee the project to completion.

The expenditures are an excellent investment in the historical education of future generations of Canadians. The new CWM will house a unique and irreplaceable national historical collection: 45,000 books, periodicals, pamphlets, and technical manuals; 20,000 archival document sets including the letters, diaries, and personal papers of thousands of ordinary and extraordinary Canadians, as well as postcard, map, music, and audio collections; 27,000 photo records of every description; nearly 200 vehicles and artillery pieces, 3500 small arms, 2000 edge weapons, and half a million other military artifacts of every description; and almost 13,000 pieces of war art, including hundreds of works by the Group of Seven, Alex Colville, and many other well-known Canadian artists. The public can gain ready access to all these records by searching www.civilization.ca:8001/ or, in the case of the war art, by visiting the Canadian War Museum's homepage at www.warmuseum.ca.

Among many ongoing projects, the museum is planning exciting exhibits for the new building, delivering a wide range of educational programs, and revamping its website as a significant teaching resource. CWM seeks to be more nationally relevant to researchers and members of the general public interested not only in military history but also in material history and social history. Visitors will learn that war and the threat of war have shaped Canada's destiny and fundamentally altered the lives of millions of Canadians from all walks of life.

Helping make CWM a pillar of Canada's cultural community in the next several years will require much labour and energy, but it promises to be an exciting place to work for an historian exercising both public and academic functions. The Canadian War Museum seeks to remember, preserve, and educate. It is a giant classroom combining ideas and artifacts – and its reach is global.

À PROPOS DE L'EXCELLENCE EN ENSEIGNEMENT DE L'HISTOIRE

Le livre Who Killed Canadian History contenait des passages très sévères sur le travail des enseignants et des enseignantes en histoire, notamment ceux et celles qui travaillent dans les écoles primaires et secondaires. Ces propos fort pessimistes passent toutefois sous silence le travail exceptionnel d'enseignants et d'enseignantes du primaire et du secondaire dans le domaine de l'histoire. Depuis 1996, le travail de ces enseignants et enseignantes est récompensé et célébré par l'attribution du prix du Gouverneur général pour l'excellence en enseignement de l'histoire canadienne. Ce prix, attribué à tous les ans, permet, d'une part, d'honorer le travail exceptionnel d'enseignants et d'enseignantes imaginatifs et passionnés pour l'histoire. D'autre part, ce prix favorise le partage d'approches pédagogiques puisque les finalistes sont encouragés à partager leurs idées et méthodes d'apprentissage avec d'autres collègues du milieu éducatif.

Le prix du Gouverneur général pour l'excellence en enseignement de l'histoire canadienne est sous la responsabilité de la Société d'histoire nationale du Canada et administré par Co Ed Communications de Toronto. Depuis 1996, une centaine de dossiers sont soumis chaque année à un comité de juges formés notamment d'historiens universitaires ainsi que d'enseignants et d'enseignantes du primaire et du secondaire. Douze finalistes sont choisis et un seul reçoit le prix du Gouverneur général.

Pour les historiens et historiennes qui travaillent dans le milieu universitaire, il est important d'encourager les enseignants et enseignantes du primaire et du secondaire que nous connaissons à participer. D'abord, il est indispensable d'encourager ces enseignants et enseignantes, qui consacrent leur temps et énergie à l'enseignement de l'histoire, à soumettre leur dossier de candidature pour que l'excellence de leur travail soit reconnue. De plus, leurs activités pédagogiques reliées à l'histoire pourront profiter à d'autres. Par ailleurs, le prix du Gouverneur général permet de mettre l'histoire en valeur puisque les finalistes et le récipiendaire du prix ont droit à « une gloire médiatique ». En effet, les médias assurent une couverture à l'événement. De cette façon, il est possible de combattre l'idée que l'étude de l'histoire est ennuyante, particulièrement l'histoire canadienne. En terminant, il est possible d'obtenir plus de renseignement sur le prix du Gouverneur général pour l'excellence en enseignement de l'histoire canadienne en consultant le site Web à l'adresse suivante :

NEW PUBLICATIONS

Cole Harris and Jean Barman, Co-Editors of BC Studies, are pleased to announce the publication of "Ethnographic Eyes," a special double issue in honour of Douglas Cole, a noted British Columbia cultural historian who died suddenly in August 1997.

Douglas Cole is best known for his groundbreaking 1985 book Captured Heritage: The Scramble for Northwest Coast Artifacts. In more recent years, he turned his attention to documenting the lives of the collectors of ethnological artifacts. He co-edited collections on George Dawson and, at the time of his death, had completed the first of an intended two-volume biography of the eminent German-American anthropologist, Franz Boas. Entitled Franz Boas: The Early Years, 1858-1906, this book was released in November 1999 by Douglas & McIntyre and the University of Washington Press.

One of Douglas Cole's early research interests was artists' depictions of British Columbia's physical terrain [From Desolation to Splendour: Changing Perceptions of the British Columbia Landscape (co-authored with Maria Tippett) 1977]. He never lost interest in this subject, as revealed in an essay on Emily Carr ("The 'Invented Indian'/The 'Imagined Emily'"') he was completing at the time of his death. We have included it in this issue.
